THE WORKFORCE STABILITY ADVANTAGE

Why People Come to Work, Why They Stay, and What Managers Can Do About It

Jenna Plessl
Founder & CEO | HR Forward Consulting

Stabilize Your Workforce. Strengthen Your Managers. Move Forward.

INTRODUCTION

Workforce stability is not created by a single HR program, an annual engagement survey or a pizza party.

It is created—or damaged—through the everyday experience of coming to work.

Employees make a practical exchange with their employer. They bring their time, effort, skills, judgment and reliability to the workplace. In return, they expect more than a paycheck. They expect the overall employment experience to make sense.

At the most basic level, most employees come to work for four things:

- Pay — Is the work worth what I am being paid?
- Benefits — Does this job help protect and support me and my family?
- Time Off — Can I have a life outside of work and recover when I need to?
- Connection & Culture — Am I respected here, do I belong here, and can I trust the people I work for?

Organizations do not need to be perfect in all four areas. But when employees consistently feel shortchanged across several of them—and especially when poor management is added to the equation—workforce instability follows.

Turnover rises. Attendance becomes less reliable. Engagement drops. Good employees stop giving discretionary effort. Supervisors spend more time filling gaps than leading. Operations feel the impact.

The good news is that many of the conditions that influence stability are within a leader's control.

This guide shows you where to start.

1. PAY: MAKE THE EXCHANGE FEEL FAIR

People work because they need income. Leaders sometimes avoid saying this because they want employees to be motivated by purpose, culture or career growth. Those things matter—but compensation is still part of the fundamental employment exchange.

Employees do not necessarily expect to be the highest paid person in the market. They do expect their pay to feel fair relative to the work, their responsibilities, their experience and what they see happening around them.

Pay becomes destabilizing when employees experience unexplained differences, compression between new and experienced workers, inconsistent starting rates, unclear increases, unexpected payroll problems or increased responsibilities without meaningful recognition.

What leaders can do:

• Review pay practices for obvious internal inequities and compression.
• Explain how pay decisions are made rather than allowing employees to fill information gaps with assumptions.
• Fix payroll errors quickly and treat them as important.
• Make sure managers never dismiss an employee's compensation concerns with comments such as "You should just be grateful to have a job."
• When the organization cannot increase pay, be transparent rather than making promises you cannot keep.

A manager may not control the wage structure, but every manager controls how honestly and respectfully compensation questions are handled.

HR FORWARD QUESTION

If you were doing this job at this rate of pay, would the employment exchange feel fair to you?

2. BENEFITS: HELP EMPLOYEES UNDERSTAND THE VALUE

Benefits matter only when employees can access, understand and use them.

An organization can spend significant money on health coverage, retirement programs, employee assistance, disability protection and other benefits while employees still say, “We don't have good benefits.” Sometimes the problem is the benefit itself. Other times, the problem is communication.

A benefits package should answer a simple question: How does working here help make my life more secure or manageable?

What leaders can do:

• Explain benefits in plain language instead of relying only on enrollment documents.
• Communicate throughout the year—not only during open enrollment.
• Remind employees about resources when they are relevant.
• Ask employees which benefits they value and which they do not understand.
• Make enrollment and access as easy as possible.
• Train supervisors to direct benefit questions appropriately instead of guessing or giving inaccurate answers.

Employees are more likely to value the total employment package when they understand what is actually included in it.

HR FORWARD QUESTION

Could the average employee clearly explain the value of working here beyond their hourly rate or salary?

3. TIME OFF: PEOPLE NEED A LIFE OUTSIDE OF WORK

Employees are people before they are employees.

They have children, spouses, parents, medical appointments, school events, emergencies, vacations, responsibilities and lives that continue when their shift ends.

Reliable attendance is essential to an operation. So is creating a workplace where employees can reasonably use the time off they have earned without being made to feel guilty for having a life.

Organizations create instability when time-off rules are confusing, applied inconsistently, routinely denied without explanation, or dependent on which supervisor happens to be working.

What leaders can do:

• Establish clear and understandable attendance and time-off expectations.
• Apply rules consistently while still using sound judgment.
• Plan staffing so approved time off is treated as a normal operating reality.
• Avoid rewarding chronic overwork as if exhaustion is commitment.
• Respect employees when legitimate personal issues arise.
• Review patterns before assuming every attendance problem is an attitude problem.

Accountability and humanity are not opposites. Strong leaders use both.

HR FORWARD QUESTION

Would you consider your organization's approach to time off reasonable if you were the employee trying to use it?

4. CONNECTION & CULTURE: THE DAILY EXPERIENCE MATTERS

Culture is not the statement hanging in the lobby.

Culture is what employees experience when they make a mistake, ask a question, disagree with a supervisor, request help, raise a concern, suggest an improvement or need flexibility.

Employees can tolerate difficult work. Many can tolerate imperfect schedules, demanding customers and busy seasons. What becomes much harder to tolerate is feeling disrespected, ignored, manipulated, embarrassed or treated as though they are easily replaceable.

Connection does not mean managers must become best friends with employees. It means employees should feel that they are known, respected and included as members of the team.

What leaders can do:

- Learn employees' names, strengths, goals and concerns.
- Explain why decisions are being made whenever possible.
- Ask for input from the people closest to the work.
- Recognize good work specifically rather than relying on generic praise.
- Address disrespect quickly, regardless of who is responsible.
- Hold regular one-on-one or informal check-ins.
- Follow through when you say you will do something.
- Admit when you do not know the answer—and then find it.

Employees watch what leaders do far more closely than what organizations say.

THE MANAGER TEST: WOULD YOU WANT TO WORK FOR YOU?

There is a remarkably simple leadership question that can prevent many workforce problems:

Would I want to be treated this way if I were the employee?

Managers are responsible for standards, productivity, safety, quality and accountability. Respect does not mean avoiding difficult conversations or lowering expectations. In fact, respectful leadership often makes accountability clearer because employees know where they stand.

Before making a people decision, managers should test it against five principles.

RESPECT

Speak to adults like adults. Correct privately whenever possible. Listen before assuming. Do not use humiliation, sarcasm, threats or status to establish authority.

AUTONOMY

Give employees appropriate control over how they accomplish their work. Set the outcome, standards and boundaries, then allow capable people room to use judgment. Micromanagement communicates distrust.

COMMON SENSE

Policies create consistency, but no policy can anticipate every situation. Good managers understand the purpose behind a rule and know when a situation needs thoughtful review rather than an automatic response.

TRANSPARENCY

Tell employees what you can tell them. Explain decisions. Do not create false certainty when you do not have an answer. Employees can usually handle difficult news better than they handle feeling misled.

INTEGRITY

Do what you said you would do. Apply expectations fairly. Admit mistakes. Do not ask employees to follow standards leaders routinely ignore themselves.

These behaviors cost very little. Their absence can cost an organization a great deal.

THE STABILITY EQUATION

Workforce stability is not the result of making employees happy every minute. Work is still work. There will be demanding days, unpopular decisions, performance expectations and necessary accountability.

The goal is to create an employment experience employees consider worth continuing.

A useful way to think about it is:

FAIR EMPLOYMENT EXCHANGE + TRUSTWORTHY MANAGEMENT + CONNECTION + CONSISTENCY = GREATER WORKFORCE STABILITY

When one area is weak, strength in another can sometimes compensate. When several areas are weak at the same time, the organization becomes vulnerable to turnover, absenteeism, disengagement and declining performance.

That is why the solution to turnover is rarely simply "pay people more" or "train the managers." Leaders need to understand the complete workforce experience.

A 10-MINUTE WORKFORCE STABILITY CHECK

Score each statement from 1 to 5:

1 = Strongly Disagree
2 = Disagree
3 = Unsure / Inconsistent
4 = Agree
5 = Strongly Agree

___ Employees generally believe their compensation is fair for the work they perform.

___ Employees understand the benefits available to them.

___ Employees can reasonably use earned time off.

___ Attendance expectations are clear and applied consistently.

___ Employees are treated respectfully by frontline managers.

___ Managers explain decisions and communicate changes honestly.

___ Employees have appropriate autonomy in how they perform their work.

___ Managers use sound judgment rather than hiding behind policy.

___ Employees have opportunities to provide input and raise concerns.

___ Leaders follow through on commitments.

___ New employees receive a consistent and welcoming onboarding experience.

___ Employees understand what is expected of them and how their performance is measured.

___ Good performance is recognized.

___ Managers address poor performance rather than allowing strong employees to carry the burden.

___ Employees can see a reasonable reason to continue working here six months from now.

TOTAL SCORE: _____ / 75

60–75 | STRONG FOUNDATION
Your workforce experience has many of the fundamentals that support stability. Focus on maintaining consistency and identifying individual areas for improvement.

45–59 | STABLE, BUT VULNERABLE
Several fundamentals are working, but inconsistencies may be creating avoidable frustration or turnover. Identify your lowest-scoring areas first.

30–44 | AT RISK
Employees are likely experiencing multiple sources of friction. Workforce instability may already be appearing through turnover, attendance, manager issues or disengagement.

Below 30 | ACTION NEEDED
The organization likely has systemic workforce issues rather than isolated employee problems. A structured diagnostic and action plan should be a priority.

FROM ENGAGEMENT TO STABILITY

Employee engagement is valuable, but engagement should not be treated as the end goal.

An employee can enjoy coworkers and still leave for better pay. An employee can be well paid and still leave because of a disrespectful supervisor. An employee can like the company and still burn out because the schedule is unsustainable.

Stability requires leaders to look at the entire employment experience.

Start with three questions:

1. Where are employees experiencing the most friction?
2. Which problems are within our control to improve?
3. What can we change in the next 90 days that employees will actually experience?

Do not begin with a list of twenty initiatives. Choose two or three high-impact issues, assign ownership, establish measures and follow through.

Employees do not judge improvement by the quality of the action plan. They judge it by what changes when they come to work.

5 THINGS YOU CAN DO THIS WEEK

1. ASK
Ask five employees: “What is one thing that would make working here better without making the job easier?” Listen without defending.

2. OBSERVE
Spend time where the work happens. Look at the employee experience from arrival through the end of the shift.

3. REVIEW
Look at turnover and attendance by department, shift, supervisor and tenure—not just companywide averages.

4. COACH
Ask every frontline manager to identify one thing they can do differently this week to show employees more respect, transparency or trust.

5. FOLLOW THROUGH

Choose one employee concern you can reasonably address and close the loop. Even when the answer is no, explain why.

A FINAL THOUGHT FOR MANAGERS

Employees will not remember every policy you administered, every production target you hit or every meeting you held.

They will remember how it felt to work for you.

They will remember whether you listened.

Whether you kept your word.

Whether you gave them a reasonable amount of trust.

Whether you treated them fairly when something went wrong.

Whether you told them the truth.

And whether you treated them like a person rather than simply labor needed to fill a schedule.

Strong workforce management is not about lowering standards. It is about creating an environment where people understand the standards, have the support and autonomy to meet them, and believe the people leading them deserve their trust.

That is where engagement becomes stability.

And that is where a stronger operation begins.

READY TO UNDERSTAND WHAT IS DRIVING INSTABILITY IN YOUR WORKFORCE?

Turnover, attendance problems, supervisor inconsistency and disengagement are often symptoms—not root causes.

HR Forward Consulting helps manufacturing, distribution and shift-based employers identify where workforce friction is occurring, determine what is driving it and build practical solutions that improve stability and frontline leadership.

The HR Forward Workforce Stability Assessment examines eight critical dimensions of the employee experience and converts the findings into clear priorities and actionable recommendations.

If your organization is experiencing recurring turnover, attendance issues, inconsistent management practices or difficulty retaining employees, the next step is not another generic engagement initiative.

Start by finding the friction.

HR FORWARD CONSULTING

Stabilize Your Workforce. Strengthen Your Managers. Move Forward.

www.thehrforward.com
info@thehrforward.com
484-379-8440

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Jenna Plessl is a Human Resources leader with more than 20 years of experience supporting employees, frontline managers and business leaders across manufacturing, distribution, retail and other operational environments. Her work focuses on practical solutions to complex people problems, frontline manager development, performance management and workforce stability.

As Founder & CEO of HR Forward Consulting, Jenna helps organizations identify the causes of workforce instability, strengthen frontline leadership and build practical people systems that support a stronger operation.

© 2026 HR Forward Consulting. All rights reserved.

This guide provides general human resources and management information and is not legal advice. Employment laws, organizational policies and individual circumstances vary. Organizations should consult qualified HR or legal counsel regarding specific employment decisions.